Where is the data supporting the Great Lakes Basin claim that towns do not want the rail line to run through them? Many towns, for example Streator, IL, may want to have the line run through them and utilize existing underused rail lines. I am asking the current GLBT project be issued an immediate no build ruling, as clearly they have failed to explore the very real possibility that populated areas want the line, also they have failed to explain why the route needs to be in unpopulated areas, it would seem if the route has to be in unpopulated areas they are admitting the route is not in the public's interest and if that is the case why does the rural public have to put up with a project populated areas do not want, because we do not want it either.
