Private Citizen

My husband and I like to travel, but we do not like large cities, instead we visit small towns and discover amazing things to do in them. How do we avoid the big cities but still see the entire country? We use by-passes, roads that start outside the major cities and end on the other side of the same city. these road are located far away from the heart of a major city and usually have few if any other access points and seldom have exits. they are designed to move traffic quickly out of an area. GLBT seems lost on this concept as throughout their "by-pass" they have trains entering and exiting the route and seem to want to move freight from one area of Chicago to another, why else do they need all these interchanges. They have also failed to locate themselves away from populated areas, they are in the far suburbs of Chicago, this is not where a bypass should be located a by pass needs to be outside of all heavily populated areas and the GLBT line is not located outside of these areas, in fact it is located in areas poised to grow rapidly in population as the economy improves. GLBT seems lost on the concept of being a bypass and as such the project must be denied as it does not serve it's stated purpose and all it does is move trains from one area that is populated into another populated areas. Please issue an immediate no build opinion on the GLBT project.
