I have spent over 80 years on my farm. I have seen good years and bad years. Floods, blizzards and tornados have and do occur regularly, with a force no one can imagine unless they have been there. My family has been snow bound for a week and seen roads blocked for days by debris and even snow. What strikes me in the GLBT proposal is their "expert" expects to control the snow by use of vegetation. When the storms come there is no tree or bush that can stop it. This is just one of the many outlandish "facts" a company with no rail experience and no experience living in the area they seek to build in seeks to have you believe. I would like to know how a company with no verifiable assets, no current income, no committed users, and no operating experience can seek approval to build a new rail line. Public necessity is determined in part by financial ability and this project has failed to show any financial ability, and for that reason it must be denied.
