The Great Lakes Basin project must be denied as not meeting public necessity to be built. A component of public necessity involves whether the public has access to existing rail services. Today that answer is yes, the public has multiple places they may access the existing freight line services to ship items via rail, if the public so chose to do so. Therefore since the public has adequate access to the existing rail service lines to ship freight, if the public so chooses to do so, this line must be denied.
